My mother left my birth father, who was an addict and alcoholic, when I was still an infant. She remarried a sea captain when I was two and he adopted me. So though it was explained to me at a very young age that I had a biological father, I never questioned who my father was. The Captain had been there as long as I could remember.

Growing up, my sister and I spent afternoons and weekends with our boat-captain father while our mother worked long hours as a lawyer. We did our homework on sailboat decks, played hide-and-seek in marine-supply warehouses, and quietly practiced our knots as my father did business with ship chandlers, sailmakers, yacht brokers, and deckhands.
